A well-designed paper should consist of three main parts:

- Entry,
- Content,
- Conclusion.

The paper sets the task of revealing the theme in accordance with the questions posed.
We write the composition correctly: if we need to write the most ordinary composition, then consider it here on a clear example.
We will stick to three (classical) main parts: Introduction; content; conclusion.

Introductory part
The introductory part introduces the reader to the theme of the work and leads to the disclosure of the main aspects of the work. Describe the title of the theme to reveal the essence of the title, to ask a question, the answer to which will be disclosed in the substantive part.

Substantial part
The content part is the most important, the main part of the work, it reveals the theme, explains the essence of the work. Show your vision of nature as other authors in fiction see nature. Avoid a simple statement or retelling, try to meaningfully describe the most vivid impressions that nature leaves you. Comprehension bringing the theme of the work to the reader will be the main task of the substantive part of the work.

Final part
In the final part, the results of the whole work are summed up, conclusions are drawn from the disclosed theme of the work; the final part should not be large, but thorough. In the final paragraph it is possible to smooth out all defects in the course of work on the composition if it will be clear, whenever possible, short and will surely finish the composition, having completely answered all questions put.

How to write paper

This form of composition, as a rule, not necessarily on a literary work, topic in the form of a short story in his own words with a discussion on a given topic of the composition.
In fiction, the paper often has an emotional, sensual transfer of the mood of the described landscape, events. The main feature of the paper a free presentation of thoughts and feelings. The article is about how to properly prepare and write, using all the tactical-literary techniques. The paper always has the purpose to convince the reader of something, to change or fix his opinion on a certain question. Therefore, the basis of reasoning, its core becomes clearly formulated, understandable and justified from different positions one main idea.

Writing a paper
Step one. Clearly and fully formulate the idea you want to prove.
You can check the success of this step as follows. Read the wording to several people: if they have no questions about your position (objections to the essence of the question - do not count), then the wording is successful. Now you can move on to writing a paper.
The complete paper consists of 3 parts:

* thesis (the thought, judgment, position that you have formulated and that will prove);
* arguments (each of them should serve as a visual, accomplished, and therefore convincing proof of your thoughts);
* conclusion (it essentially repeats the thesis, but takes it to a new level with broad generalizations, forecasts, recommendations, etc.).

An optional, but desirable part of the reasoning is a brief introduction, the task of which is to engage the reader in a dialogue, to indicate the essence and relevance of the problem.

Main part: arguments, the content of the argument

Argumentation in the paper should occupy at least 2/3 of the total volume. The optimal number of arguments for a small (school or examination) paper is three.

The best arguments are widely known historical facts (or not very well known, but which can be easily found in authoritative sources-encyclopedias, reference books, scientific works, etc.). A good proof will be the statistics, the events discussed. In the practice of school paper, the most powerful argument is a literary work, but not all, but the episode, the story line, the story of the hero, which confirm your idea. To pick up arguments correctly, mentally each time pronounce the thesis and ask from it a question "Why?»

Conclusion

The conclusion deepens the thesis, contains — albeit not explicit-tips, rules, offers predictions.
